

New Poetry by Kathleen Hellen: "People Boats" and "Pretending There Is A Garden In The Spring, Paradise In Time"

DREAMS SWELL LASHED / image by Amalie Flynn people boats dreams swell/ lashed to circumstance in Syria/ in Gambia/launched from Libya in leaky rubber chugs to birdless deep/chugs w/ floor of feet w/ canopy of arms like 700 starfish sweating/ surfing demons/ keeling keening groaning spinning ferment/ tossed estrange/ the black moon sinking into raucous mucus maelstroms/ cataract of violet distress/ the turbulence of orange sun/ bursting over flotsom/ boats adrift/ boats repelled/ prison haulers fatal w/o water, w/o air fatal in shrieking rescue/ panicked sea/ 10 hours tossed to grief/where vomit waters sweep the beaches gnawed by ruptured rubber masses/ huddled under searchlights/ infant wish:: democracy pretending there is garden in the spring, paradise in time this silk and golden weft that weaves its vines through field and forest this intricate design atop a kingdom of the dying, above the restless thread of streets, the rot beneath:: Deep the sleep of mouse and wren, the carcasses of crickets. The desiccated corpses of the moths. Beneath the flowers all dyed dismal, dog and possum disemboweled, little deer with tongue stuck out, the rat beheaded, like video of hostage